University of Kansas, Fall 2006 Philosophy 148: Reason and Argument Ben Eggleston—eggleston@ku.edu Wednesday, September 27, 2006

logical components and psychological components

When reading a passage meant to persuade you of something, you should distinguish its logical components from its psychological components. A passage may be rich in logic, but poorly expressed; alternatively, it may be powerfully expressed, but lack sound logic.